In accordance with the typical positivist association of sociology and morality, Gatti argued that sociology had scientifically established universal human solidarity. This enabled her to invoke 'the sociological laws' when defending extended rights for women. She did not mention, however, that Durkheim, one of the sociologists on whom she relied, invoked, for instance, the 'hereditary inequality' between men and women to argue that the introduction of legal equality should be preceded by a not yet obtained state of 'mental equality'.
